1. Through the woods

Once upon a time there was a sweet little girl whom everyone loved. Her grandmother gave her a little cap of red velvet, and because she wore it so often she was called Little Red Riding Hood. One day her mother said, "Take this cake and bottle of wine to your grandmother; she is ill and weak, and they will do her good. Walk properly and do not leave the path, or you may fall and break the bottle." Little Red Riding Hood promised to obey, and set out through the wood.

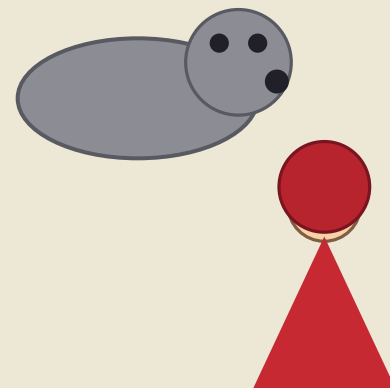

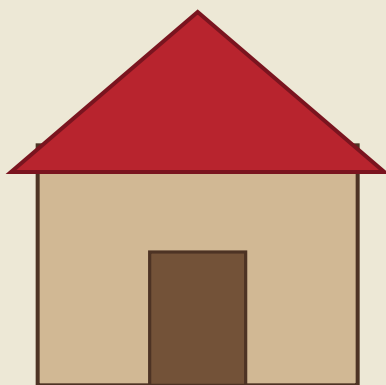

2. The wolf on the path

The wolf had been wishing for a good long while to eat her up, but he dared not because of some woodcutters near. When he met Little Red Riding Hood he asked where she was going. She told him, and the wolf thought, "The tender young thing will make a dainty morsel." He walked beside her a while, then said, "Look at the pretty flowers! Why do you not look round?" She ran from the path into the wood to pick flowers, and the wolf ran straight to the grandmother's house.

3. At grandmother's door

The wolf knocked at the door. "Who is there?" called the grandmother. "Little Red Riding Hood," answered the wolf, "with cake and wine." The old woman called, "Pull the bobbin, and the latch will go up." The wolf went in, swallowed the grandmother at one gulp, put on her nightcap, and lay down in her bed with the curtains drawn. When Little Red Riding Hood arrived she was surprised how strange her grandmother looked, and said, "Grandmother, what big eyes you have!" "The better to see you with, my child," said the wolf.

4. The woodcutters

"Grandmother, what big teeth you have!" cried Little Red Riding Hood. "The better to eat you with!" shouted the wolf, and sprang out of bed. She screamed, and the woodcutters, who were passing near the house, rushed in with their axes. The wolf ran away, but they followed and soon killed him. Then they opened the wolf's body and the grandmother stepped out, alive and well. Little Red Riding Hood fetched great stones, they filled the wolf's belly, and when he woke and tried to flee he fell dead. And Little Red Riding Hood went home happily, and no one did her any harm again.
