1. Into the woods

Once upon a time there was a sweet little girl whom everyone loved. Her grandmother gave her a little cap of red velvet, and because it suited her so well she was always called Little Red Riding Hood. One day her mother said, "Take this cake and bottle of wine to your grandmother, who is ill and weak. Go straight there and do not leave the path, or you may fall and break the bottle." Little Red Riding Hood promised to obey, and set out through the wood with her basket.

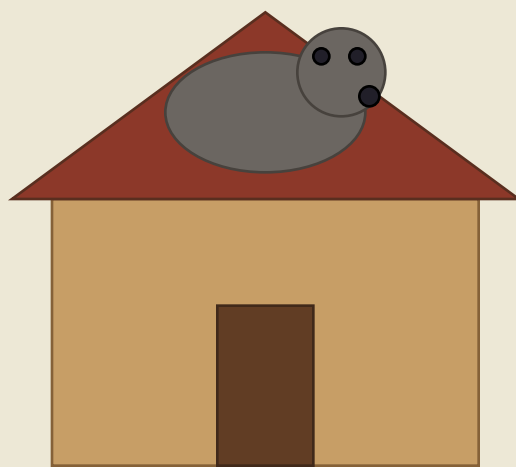

2. The wolf on the path

The wolf met her on the way. He wished to eat her, but dared not because woodcutters were near. So he asked politely where she was going. "To my grandmother's," she said, "beyond the mill, under three great oak-trees." The wolf thought, "The tender young creature will make a dainty morsel." He walked beside her a while, then said, "See what pretty flowers grow here! Why do you not look about?" Little Red Riding Hood left the path to pick blossoms, and the wolf ran straight to the grandmother's house.

3. At grandmother's door

The wolf knocked at the door. "Who is there?" called the grandmother. "Little Red Riding Hood," said the wolf, disguising his voice. "Pull the bobbin and the latch will open." He sprang upon the bed and swallowed the grandmother whole. Then he put on her cap, drew the curtains, and waited. Soon Little Red Riding Hood arrived with her basket. She was surprised to find the door standing open, and everything in the cottage seemed strange.

4. All is well again

"Grandmother, what big eyes you have!" "The better to see you with, my child." "Grandmother, what big teeth you have!" "The better to eat you with!" cried the wolf, and leaped from the bed. At that moment a huntsman passed by, heard the noise, and rushed in. He cut open the sleeping wolf, and out stepped Little Red Riding Hood and her grandmother, frightened but unharmed. They filled the wolf's belly with stones; when he woke he could not run away, and everyone was safe.
