1. Into the woods

Once upon a time there was a sweet little girl whom everyone loved. Her grandmother had made her a little hood of red velvet, and because she wore it so often she was called Little Red Riding Hood. One day her mother said, "Take this cake and bottle of wine to your grandmother; she is ill and weak, and they will do her good. Walk properly and do not leave the path, or you may fall and break the bottle." Little Red Riding Hood promised to obey, and set out through the wood with her basket.

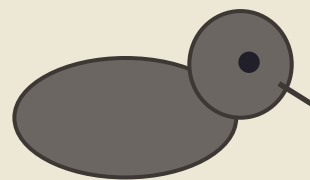

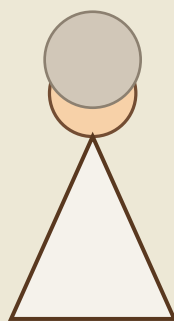

2. The wolf on the path

As she went, a Wolf met her. He wished to eat her, but dared not do so in the open wood where woodcutters were near. So he walked beside her and asked where she was going. 'To my grandmother,' she said, 'in the little house beyond the mill.' The Wolf thought, 'The old woman is a choice morsel; I must act craftily.' He urged her to pick flowers for her grandmother, and while she wandered from the path he ran straight to the cottage and knocked at the door.

3. At grandmother's door

The Wolf slipped inside, devoured the poor grandmother, put on her nightcap, and lay down in her bed. When Little Red Riding Hood arrived she was surprised to find the door unlatched. She stepped in and went to the bed. "Oh, grandmother," she said, "what big ears you have!" "The better to hear you with." "What big eyes you have!" "The better to see you with." "What big teeth you have!" "The better to eat you with!" And scarcely had the Wolf spoken when he sprang from the bed.

4. Saved from the wolf

A huntsman passing by heard the noise, rushed in, and with his axe freed Little Red Riding Hood and her grandmother from the Wolf. They filled the wolf's body with heavy stones; when he awoke and tried to flee, he sank and was seen no more. Little Red Riding Hood went home and from that time forward thought of her mother's words whenever she walked through the wood: stay on the path, and do not speak to strangers.
