1. Into the woods

Once upon a time there was a sweet little maiden. Everyone who saw her loved her, but her grandmother loved her most of all. One day her mother said, "Take this cake and bottle of wine to your grandmother, who is ill and weak. Go straight there, and do not wander from the path into the wood, for the trees are thick and the way is long." The child promised, put on her little red cap, took the basket, and set out through the forest.

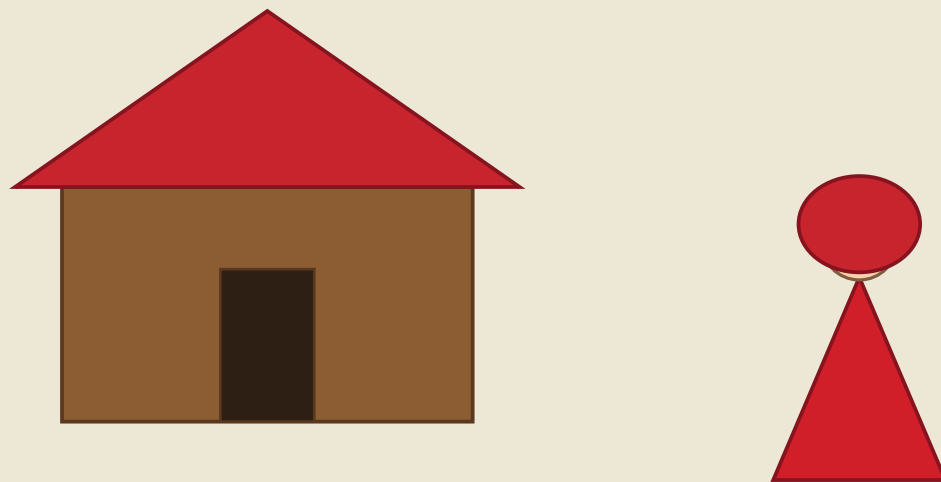

2. The wolf on the path

As Little Red Riding Hood walked, a wolf met her. He wished to eat her, but dared not because of woodcutters nearby. "Good day, Little Red Riding Hood," he said. "Where are you going so early?" "To my grandmother, who lives beyond the mill under three great oaks." The wolf thought, "The tender young thing will make a delicate morsel." He walked beside her a while, then said, "See what pretty flowers grow here ? why not pick a nosegay for your grandmother?"

3. At grandmother's door

While the child gathered flowers, the wolf ran straight to the grandmother's house and knocked. "Little Red Riding Hood," he called, "with cake and wine ? open the door." The door was unlatched, and the wolf sprang inside. When Little Red Riding Hood at last came to the cottage, she wondered that the door stood open. Everything looked so strange. She went to the bed and drew back the curtain. There lay her grandmother, but the cap was pulled far over her face, and she looked very odd.

4. The woodcutter's rescue

"Oh, Grandmother, what big ears you have!" "The better to hear you with." "What big eyes you have!" "The better to see you with." "What big hands you have!" "The better to seize you with!" "What a terrible big mouth you have!" "The better to eat you with!" The wolf sprang from the bed, but a huntsman passing by heard the cry, ran in, and rescued them. The grandmother drank the wine, ate the cake, and soon felt strong again. Little Red Riding Hood thought, "Never again will I leave the path and run into the wood when my mother has forbidden it."
