1. Into the forest

Once upon a time there was a sweet little girl whom everyone loved. Her grandmother had made her a little red velvet cap, and she wore it so often that she was called Little Red Riding Hood. One day her mother said, "Take this cake and bottle of wine to your grandmother; she is ill and weak, and they will do her good. Walk properly and do not leave the path, or you may fall and break the bottle." Little Red Riding Hood promised to obey, and set out through the wood.

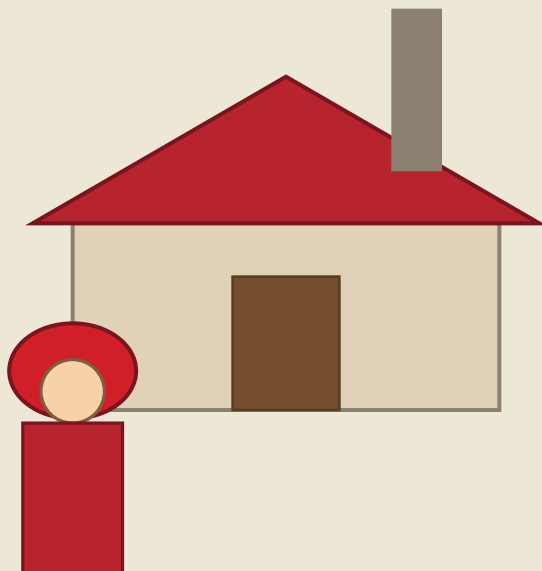

2. The wolf on the path

She had not gone far when the Wolf met her. He wished her good day, but he thought, "What a tender young creature! She will be a nice morsel." Aloud he asked where she was going. "To my grandmother, who lives under the three great oak-trees." The Wolf thought of a plan. He ran straight to the grandmother's house and knocked. When the door opened, he sprang in and swallowed the poor old woman at one gulp.

3. At grandmother's door

Little Red Riding Hood gathered flowers along the way and arrived late. She knocked, and a rough voice answered, "Who is there?" "Little Red Riding Hood, with cake and wine. Open the door." "Lift the latch and come in," said the Wolf, disguising his voice. She entered, and found the curtains drawn. "Grandmother, what big ears you have!" "The better to hear you with." "Grandmother, what big eyes you have!" "The better to see you with." "Grandmother, what big teeth you have!" "The better to eat you with!" And the Wolf leaped from the bed.

4. The rescue

A huntsman passing by heard the noise and stepped inside. He saw the Wolf and knew the old woman was in danger. He took his knife, cut open the sleeping Wolf, and out stepped Little Red Riding Hood and her grandmother, both unharmed. They filled the Wolf's body with heavy stones; when he woke and tried to run away, the stones dragged him down. Little Red Riding Hood thanked the huntsman, and she never again left the path to pick flowers while on an errand.
